Both for PC manufacturers and SSD manufacturers it is common to specify a size of the SSD for a certain amount of cache. Especially when building new PCs, there are multiple components that can be put in the same enclosure. On the other hand, only one SSD can be put in one enclosure. Therefore, it seems logical to bundle them together. But can you really save that amount of disk space with such a cache? A: I don't think that cache size is much of an issue. However, when it comes to writing and reading data, an SSD can and will accelerate operations (on a per-block basis) by reading a data block, reading from cache, and writing it back to the SSD. The SSD's flash is relatively slow though, and if it is being polled regularly, then it will stall for a bit waiting for the data to be written to flash, effectively losing some performance during that time. In the end, cache size is important because it does not need to be rewritten as frequently as the data blocks on the SSD, and it can be read from and written to more quickly than the flash media. The 2D backlight source is generally characterized by a 2D light source arranged in a planar manner and illuminating light emitted from the 2D light source being projected onto a display region of a display device for producing 2D
